

Binge Drinking on College Campuses

John Moon

San Jose State University

Across the globe, young adults are leaving home for the first time to attend the university they were accepted to. With this transition comes more freedom than they've ever had in their lives, and an abundance of friends over the legal drinking age. For many students, this creates a "perfect storm" for a frequently occurring activity: binge drinking. While drinking heavily in college is socially acceptable for the most part, there are many negative aspects involved with it. This paper will bring to light and examine both the positive and negative aspects of binge drinking in college. It will take a narrower view to more specifically look at the culture of university students in the United States.

Drinking Culture

In the United States, the drinking age is 21-years-old. When students are in high school, they become curious about the use of alcohol and want to start using it recreationally. In 2013, a survey of high school students found that 35% of students had drank some amount of alcohol in the past 30 days, and 21% of them had binge drank (CDC). This indicates that a large proportion of high school students in the U.S. are intrigued by the use of alcohol. The taboo nature of drinking is attractive to adolescents as it projects an air of rebellion - a common trait in people this age.

Outside of the U.S., it's uncommon to see a drinking age higher than 18-years-old. One study found that in Europe, teens in high school have drinking events more often than those in the U.S., however these events have "fewer occasions of dangerous intoxication". In Europe, 10% of those drinking occasions result in intoxication while 50% of drinking events in the U.S. result in intoxication. High school students get to college, they're able to make their own decisions. Without their parents around, these students have far fewer inhibitions when it comes to drinking. Nationally, we see that, "between 25 and 30 percent of college students drink alcohol at a level that is regarded as problematic in the general population" (Villanova). Additionally, approximately 70% of college students report using alcohol in a non-problematic nature.

It's clear that there's a certain attraction that college students have to binge drinking. The environment is perfect for the activity, the social norms are in place, and the developmental state of many students lends itself to being a little bit reckless.

But just how much does this cultural perception of binge drinking effect the actual feelings that students have towards it?

Students' Feelings on Binge Drinking

Peer pressure affects all of us throughout our lives. Sometimes, especially in college, students will participate in an activity simply because their peers are participating. Binge drinking takes place every weekend on campuses across the country. Every student has their reasons for participating, but the most common ones can be pinpointed. In a study conducted by University of Minnesota, they found that the following percentages of students on college campuses believe drinking has these effects:

- Breaks the ice: 74.4%
- Enhances social activity: 74.4%
- Gives people something to do: 71.7%
- Gives people something to talk about: 66.6%
- Allows people to have more fun: 63.1%
- Facilitates male bonding: 60.1%
- Facilitates a connection with peers 61.7%
- Facilitates sexual opportunities: 53.0%
- Facilitates female bonding: 28.8%
- Makes women sexier: 28.8%
- Makes food taste better: 22.7%
- Makes me sexier: 20.4%
- Makes men sexier: 19.9%

It seems that students have the general feeling that drinking acts as a social lubricant of sorts. It releases them from feeling the awkward, shy feelings that we've all felt during developmental stages. These are perfectly valid reasons for imbibing, but what leads students to drinking more heavily - to the point where it's considered unhealthy?